A wide-angle landscape photograph of the Valley of the Gods. The scene is dominated by vast, rolling hills and mesas covered in reddish-brown sedimentary rock. In the foreground, a large, craggy rock formation rises from the left side. The middle ground shows more of these layered rock formations, some with distinct vertical streaks. The background features a prominent, tall, rectangular butte standing on the right side of the frame. The sky above is a clear, vibrant blue, providing a sharp contrast to the earthy tones of the rocks.

An aerial photograph of Chetro Ketl, a massive archaeological site in Chaco Canyon. The complex features numerous multi-story stone buildings, including several large circular structures known as great kivas. The architecture is built from light-colored stone and adobe. The site is situated in a dry, open landscape with sparse vegetation and rolling hills in the background.

A photograph showing a section of a thick stone wall made of large, flat stones. A small rectangular opening, or niche, is visible in the center of the wall. Light is streaming through this opening, illuminating the interior of the niche. The surrounding area is covered in dry, yellowish-brown grass and low-lying plants. In the foreground, there is a paved surface made of large, irregular stones. The overall scene suggests a historical or archaeological site.
